

Statement by the Chairman of the Administrative Control Authority

"Sustainability" Scientific research is a cornerstone in supporting and advancing the achievement of sustainable development. Its significant impact and positive influence are reflected across various development indicators. While political and community will serve as the primary drivers and the heart of development, scientific research acts as the engine and guiding light essential for societal progress. Development and scientific research are inseparable when it comes to planning, effective implementation, and driving advancement across all developmental sectors. Their synergy is critical in achieving several key objectives, including boosting economic growth, improving the living standards of citizens, enhancing the quality of services, and fostering the discovery of new scientific and practical ideas. Scientific research plays a vital role in advancing knowledge within academic circles, addressing challenges at all levels, and creating practical applications that serve societies while enriching the dynamic and evolving human capital.

In alignment with this vision, the Administrative Control Authority (ACA) continues to publish the second issue of the journal Governance, Preventing and Combating Corruption. (JGPCC). This journal reflects the scientific trajectory and research focus of the Egyptian Anti-Corruption Academy (EACA). The first issue attracted considerable attention from researchers at local, regional, and international levels, further cementing its scientific leadership in Egypt and the region in the fields of preventing and combating corruption, as well as related knowledge areas.

We encourage all experts and specialists to contribute to this scientific initiative following the publication guidelines by sharing their insights, experiences, and research findings within the journal's targeted fields. Their contributions will enrich scientific research and help achieve the desired outcomes for the betterment of society.

In closing, we pray to Allah Almighty for the success of these efforts, for His continued protection, and for guidance in helping our beloved Egypt achieve the goals set forth in this publication.

Major General/Amr Adel
